ESSAY

1. Describe the origins of the American Revolution. Who were the main groups that made up colonial society and what were their grievances against the British? What conflicts, if any, existed among the colonists themselves?

ANS:

There are three components to this question:

- a. Main groups in colonial society: Five groups were important in colonial politics: (1) the New England merchants; (2) the southern planters; (3) the “royalists”—holders of royal lands, offices, and patents; (4) shopkeepers, artisans, and laborers; and (5) small farmers.
- b. Grievances against the British: Dissatisfaction with British tax policies and discontent over retaliatory acts of political repression radicalized many colonists to push for independence from British rule. Particularly important were the Stamp Act and other taxes on commerce, such as the Sugar Act of 1764 (which most heavily affected the New England merchants and the southern planters). The planters and merchants organized the shopkeepers, small farmers, laborers, and artisans against the British. The Boston Tea Party, organized in response to the British government granting the East India Company a monopoly on the export of tea from Britain, goaded the British into enacting a number of harsh reprisals that further radicalized Americans.
- c. Conflicts among colonists: Throughout the eighteenth century, these groups were in conflict over issues of taxation, trade, and commerce. For the most part, however, the southern planters, the New England merchants, and the royal office and patent holders—groups that together made up the colonial elite—were able to maintain a political alliance that held in check the more radical forces representing shopkeepers, laborers, and small farmers.

2. Describe some of the problems under the Articles of Confederation that led to the drafting of a new Constitution. In your answer, be sure to discuss national defense, foreign affairs, and the national government's power under the Articles of Confederation, as well as Shays's Rebellion.

ANS:

There are four components to this question:

- a. National defense: The central government had no army and the nation's armed forces were composed entirely of the state militias. Without a national military, the nation's borders were difficult to protect against this potentially hostile foreign power.
- b. Foreign affairs: The federal government was unable to enforce existing treaties and there was no national military. Furthermore, competition among the states for foreign commerce allowed the European powers to play the states off one another, which created confusion on both sides of the Atlantic.

- c. National power: The Articles of Confederation allowed for only a weak federal government, with state governments retaining most of the power. This situation became alarming when “radical” forces began to exert considerable influence in a number of state governments.
- d. Shays’s Rebellion: In 1787, Daniel Shays led a mob of farmers in a rebellion against the government of Massachusetts. It is quite possible that the Constitutional Convention would never have taken place without this event. The rebellion showed that the Congress under the Confederation was unable to act decisively in a time of crisis.

3. Describe and analyze the conflicts and compromises that occurred during the drafting of the Constitution. What was the main source of conflict between large and small states, and how did the Great Compromise resolve it? What was the nature of the conflict regarding slavery during the Philadelphia convention? How did the Three-Fifths Compromise address this conflict?

ANS:

There are four components to this question:

- a. Conflict between large and small states: Large and small states were divided over representation. The Virginia Plan framework that called for representation in the national legislature based on the population of each state was supported by large states. The New Jersey Plan framework that called for equal state representation in the national legislature regardless of population was supported by small states.
- b. The Great Compromise: Under this compromise, in the House of Representatives, representatives would be apportioned according to the population in each state. This was what delegates from the large states had sought. But in the Senate, each state would have equal representation regardless of its size.
- c. Slavery: Whatever they thought of slavery, most delegates from the northern states opposed counting slaves in the distribution of congressional seats. Southern delegates stated that they would never enter the Union if slaves were not counted as part of the basis for representation.
- d. Three-Fifths Compromise: Northerners and southerners eventually reached agreement through the Three-Fifths Compromise. The seats in the House of Representatives would be apportioned according to a “population” in which five slaves would count as three free persons. The slaves would not be allowed to vote, of course, but the number of representatives would be apportioned accordingly.

4. The separation of powers and federalism are two key features of the Constitution. Discuss why the Founders chose to include these institutional arrangements in the Constitution and how they function. In your answer, be sure to define what is meant by the separation of powers and federalism and to describe how each functions in the American political system.

ANS:

There are three components to this question:

- a. Why the Founders included these institutional arrangements in the Constitution: The Founders incorporated the separation of powers and federalism in order to guard against the possible misuse of governmental power.

- b. Discussing separation of powers: The separation of powers refers to the division of governmental power among several institutions that must cooperate in decision making. Another important feature of the separation of powers is the principle of giving each of the branches a distinctly different constituency (e.g., the president chosen indirectly by electors; the House by popular vote; the Senate by state legislatures; and the judiciary by presidential appointment). The separation of powers requires a system of checks and balances (mechanisms through which each branch of government is able to participate in and influence the activities of the other branches). Examples of these features include the presidential veto power over congressional legislation, the power of the Senate to approve presidential appointments, and judicial review of congressional enactments.
- c. Discussing federalism: Federalism is a system of government in which power is divided, by a constitution, between a central government and regional governments. Compared with the Articles of Confederation, federalism was a step toward greater centralization of power. The framers' concern with national supremacy was expressed in Article VI, in the supremacy clause. Thus, they devised a system of two sovereigns—the states and the nation—with the hope that competition between the two would be an effective limitation on the power of both.

5. The process of ratifying the Constitution generated extensive disagreements between Federalists and Antifederalists. Discuss three issues that divided the Federalists and Antifederalists during the ratification debate and summarize each side's arguments on these issues.

ANS:

There are three components to this question:

- a. Representation: One major area of contention between the two sides was representation. Antifederalists asserted that representatives must be "a true picture of the people." They argued that this could be achieved only in small, relatively homogeneous republics such as the existing states. Federalists saw no reason that representatives should be precisely like those they represented. In their view, one of the great advantages of representative government was precisely the possibility that the people would choose as their representatives individuals possessing ability, experience, and talent superior to their own.
- b. The threat of tyranny: From the Antifederalist perspective, the greatest danger was that the few would use their power to tyrannize the many. For this reason, Antifederalists were critical of the unelected institutions in the Constitution (such as the Senate, the executive, and the federal judiciary). The Federalists were fearful of majority tyranny. From the Federalist perspective, it was precisely those features of the Constitution that the Antifederalists attacked as potential sources of tyranny that actually offered the best hope of averting the threat of oppression.
- c. Governmental power: Antifederalists favored limiting and enumerating the powers granted to the national government in relation both to the states and to the people at large. Antifederalists also demanded that a bill of rights be added to the Constitution to place limits on the government's power. Federalists favored the construction of a government with broad powers to defend the nation against foreign foes, guard against domestic strife and insurrection, promote commerce, and expand the nation's economy.
