2) Business planning is an integrated process that involves planning at three levels of an organization. Describe the three levels and how they are integrated.

Answer:

The three levels are corporate (or strategic) planning, marketing planning, and marketing communications planning. Corporate planning, conducted by senior executives, provides guidance and direction for the marketing planning. It lets the brand and marketing managers know what direction the executives would like to take the company. Marketing planning provides direction to the communications specialists on the key target markets, brand identity, and the 4Ps so that the right message can be directed to the right target and the right time.

3) Describe how demographic and social influences might affect a brand such as McDonald's.

Answer:

An aging population may mean menu changes and staffing changes, as busier times may be mid-morning coffee and earlier dinners. The trend towards urbanization may require more locations in the city centers and less in the suburbs. More ethnically diverse, more health and fitness conscious will definitely affect menu choices. All of these elements will then change the marketing communications strategies in both content and media selection.

4) Describe the five main strategic options available to corporations and provide an example of each.

Answer:

Divestment occurs when a corporation chooses to remove a division, product line, or even a single product from its portfolio. This could be as simple as McDonald's removing its fish sandwich from the menu. An acquisition strategy is when a corporation chooses to add a division, product line, or even a single product in order to grow the company by adding something that already exists. An example would be Pepsi-Co acquiring Frito Lay. Penetration strategy involves aggressive marketing existing products as with telecommunication providers. A new product development strategy is what made Apple grow exponentially with products such as the iPod, iTunes, iPhone and the iPad. A strategic alliance involves a relationship between two companies where the resources are combined in a marketing venture like seeing KFC and Taco Bell partnered in the same drive-thru.
